

Tips for managing food allergies at work

Staying conscious of your health at work

Do you feel uncomfortable trying to manage your food allergies at work? Are you self-conscious turning down a slice of a co-worker's birthday cake because you have an egg allergy? Do you think only children have peanut allergies? Do you avoid going out to eat with colleagues because you don't want to ask the waiter about ingredients?

It's important for your health — and the health of co-workers who may also be suffering in silence — to be comfortable talking about food allergies.

Navigating allergies in common workplace settings

In the break room	If you need to adjust your responsibilities to avoid food allergy triggers, your supervisor should know. For example, if you have a peanut allergy, your employer may need to arrange for peanut-free lunch menu items or designated break room tables for people with food allergies.
Around the office	Yes, it may be difficult for people to deal with a chronic condition that they can't see, but open communication can help you and them. Post a sign in your office or cubicle. Thank your coworkers for being sensitive to your food allergies. Offer to consult with anyone planning functions with food involved. By being an advocate and educator for food allergies, you'll probably end up helping a lot more people than you can imagine.
Meetings	If you're attending a meeting where food will be served, let the meeting organizer know ahead of time that you have a food allergy. The organizer may want to ask people to refrain from bringing food into the meeting room.
Going out to eat with co-workers	You don't want to miss out on opportunities to socialize or conduct business with co-workers or your manager at a restaurant. Perhaps you can suggest a list of restaurants where you know you can get a safe meal. Or call the restaurant in advance to make sure they have, or can make, a safe dish for you. If it's a spontaneous invitation, you can still suggest a restaurant. Don't feel embarrassed for speaking up. Think of it this way, speaking up could very well save you a trip to the hospital.
Workplace parties	If your office likes to have parties, you might suggest celebrating special occasions with non-food activities. Or bring your own meal and utensils to avoid contamination. Again, it's important to communicate with your supervisor and colleagues about the importance of food allergies and the proper accommodations.

The information and materials included in MetLife's Health and Wellness Information Library, including all toolkits, modules, template communications, text, charts, graphics and other materials, (collectively, the "Content") are intended to provide general guidance on health and wellness matters and are not, and should not be relied on as, medical advice. While the Content is based on resources that MetLife believes to be well-documented, MetLife is not responsible for the accuracy of the Content, and you rely on the Content at your own risk. Each person's condition and health circumstances are unique, and therefore the Content may not apply to you. The Content is not a substitute for professional medical advice. You should always consult your licensed health care professional for the diagnosis and treatment of any medical condition and before starting or changing your health regimen, including seeking advice regarding what drugs, diet, exercise routines, physical activities or procedures are appropriate for your particular condition and circumstances.